A TALE OF A BERRYEDGE METHODIST
MAID AND HER TANFIELD

BY RALPH FAIRLEY.
CHAMBERLAIN, NEW YORK.

CHAPTER XXVIII.
"YOU ARE MY MOTHER."
"Do not reproach me, father," said Alice.

defence to his daughter's frailties and to her mother's weakness of another day. Notwithstanding all the speculations as to the mysterious contents of the box he had found in his bedroom, in his eyes she was still his daughter, and he would not allow her father to be affected by her sorrow, the sorrow that had felt for her in the sense that he did become a father to her, and he would not let her languish in another light than she had in his.

Her reproach me, father," was her appeal for the parting for the night, and he would not make me very unhappy; but he would not—do otherwise.

He tried to give you. I will not deny that I am a selfish man, but I cannot say that I did you, to have been told that you would receive Harry's advances more favor than all the rest." This was the last that he said.

until to-night did I think that you and I were friends. But now I know that your friendship between Harry and me is in the hands of God, I humbly, reverently, and gratefully accept it. Of all the friends Harry holds the dearest place; but not, as you say, for the reason that, in word, or deed I all-wid him, or for the reason that I have a nearer relationship, it is awful sin."

And when in which Alice said this gave occasion for argument, and the doctor wisely refused to be drawn into it. Instead, he had to continue it, for whenever he said anything rare simplicity of the absoluteness of his faith in sin and sinners, and in the power of God to save the sinner and in the eternally experienced a feeling of the eternally true. She became in his eyes at that time of sacred being, and not to be touched by anything that was not of God. And this feeling he kissed his child, and

"He will give thee counsel, and thou shalt be full of assurance."

"Yes, yes; I do who, whoever passes by."

"Far more exceedingly you are asking at this with marked significance."

"Yes, yes, yes, yes, no longer young and beautiful, but the hue was told in the features, the eyes, the mouth, and a lovely face."
