former law, ought to be strictly enforced. It is that for the regulation of the sale of intoxicating liquors passed last Session, and such a provision is that entitling travellers to refreshment within the hours during which public-houses must by law be closed. Our readers will remember how carefully this clause in the Act was discussed, and how even so minute a point was settled as whether the distance from home at which a man should become a traveller was to be computed by the Ordnance map or by the nearest town. The intention of the law

...the provision is clear enough
to any one who looks at it without bias.
Parliament intended to give to travellers, as not to publicans, a privilege. The provision is indeed liberal to the traveller as entitling him legally to refreshment after walking or riding only three miles from the place in which he last slept, and it may be doubted whether a longer distance ought not to have been specified. But it is useless just now to enter into that point; what is more important is to draw clearly the distinction between the right of the passing traveller to demand refreshment at a closed public-house during prohibited hours and the right of a publican to keep open his house for the attraction of the "keep-at-travel" men, to obtain drink

The plan in the suburbs of London, and doubtless in many other places, has been to place a man at the door of a public house, who merely asks each person wishing to enter if he is a traveller, and on receiving an affirmative answer admits him. This is nothing more nor less than a gross evasion of the spirit of the law, which gives to the traveller the right of demanding, but not to the publican the privilege of openly proving refreshment to be a passport. If it be expeditious in the interests of morality or social order, that public-houses should be closed during the greater part of Sunday—and we believe that it is—then the law should be strictly and impartially enforced.

forced. We are glad, therefore, to find that Mr. COOKE, the magistrate of Clerkenwell police-court in London, has set an example of convicting publicans who refuse to close their houses at the proper hour. On the morning of 18th inst. instead of waiting till the travellers knock and demand refreshment. The difference between the two things is very considerable. In the one case men are tempted to enter a public house, and even to walk in, and in the other they are deterred from doing so by the thought of knocking at the door of a closed tavern or of travelling to entitle themselves to the privilege of refreshment to be given by the law. Besides, it is unfair as among the members of the liquor trade that a few publicans should thus, by evading the law, actually exclude the majority of their brethren from the privilege of publicans who would presumably have taken the money in legitimate hours if it had not been previously expended.

THE LONDON PAMPHLET.—Replying to an address of thanks for the pamphlet on the Vattedress Mr. Gladstone has written as follows to our Nonconformist sisters of Leamington and its neighbourhood:—"I beg to thank you and on whose behalf I am writing, for the expression of your wishes to express to the uprightest of intentions, and to assure you that within the line of the argument and expostulation which I have deavoured to mark out, I shall firmly abide by the position which I have set forth in my pamphlet on the Vattedress."

THE REV. JAMES CAUGHEY, THE AMERICAN REVIVALIST.—A correspondent of the Christian Guardian (Toronto) says:—"I lately attended a service at the Episcopal Church, New Brunswick, at New York, an edifice which cost 600,000 dollars, and the pastor of which is the Rev. Wilson, an Englishman. The Rev. James Caughey was present at the service. The old veteran is still in the vigour of his high age. I shall Guided by our consideration of the general good and union impulses, and a much wider range is given to the objects and habits of thought than would by any mere mode of life or action. Men are lifted to a much higher point and see both public and private matters in a different light from what they do in the narrow grooves of a selfish individualism; and, certainly, everything tending in this direction ought to be encouraged and supported. Unfortunately with our unions has sprung up a spirit of coercion antagonistic to their principles and which is doing damage them in the eyes of the best of our people. A spirit that could almost be described as a "superior" spirit of "superiority." What more revolting than this? Intelligent and independent men than to be made to join this or that society or cease to work in the

and most readily present themselves as the most proper and the most useful means of attaining the end brought to bear upon the question. Usual, properly educative in a great many ways, and that if freed from the influence of the passions, would be the best means to do more to elevate and benefit our order than almost any other means that could be employed. No man now dares to right himself by the sword, and no man would dare to slay his neighbor. The law is now so strict, that it would slay almost all violent measures in connection with our combinations, those who are glad of an opportunity to express their opinions, and who are not disposed to let our reputation be injured by any means, would not be so ready to rise from the condition of senseless men, reckless and violent of our order to the dignity of the free citizen, and the rights of the citizen.

Our working, would then come wholly to rest, and give quite another count to our meetings through the country. Our meetings would be held for the purpose of doing good, and we would be able to be so tranquil by the process as to lose all the means which we hitherto have used to excite the passions, and which we believe to be the moral support of our order, and the sympathy of a great many by whom we must speak emphatically on this point. We would be dominated by the law, and we would be able to maintain our order without any utterances at all, and tended to come to such a degree of conviction that it was condoned by the body of working men. Let us break the chains of the passions, and we will be able to do more to advance the harmony that crosses the path of progress.—Albany

It is now announced that the Queen will leave Windsor for the Christmas season in a month or so there, and Her Majesty will doubtless return to Windsor for a longer stay than the fallow. The Queen will probably leave Windsor in the spring and will then call on another return to Windsor. And so the Sovereign passes from one part of her country to another, and from one capital to another, as convenient. This has become too much the matter of course to be wondered at, but it is none the less a feature to be regretted. The Queen's movements are now so regulated that a new title appears in the "Court Circular": at least, it is new to me: "The French Ambassador, and his family, will be invited to dine with the Queen at a table d'hôte at Windsor." What is an Ambassador? The Countess of Derby seems to me to be the one I read of—ambassadors at Court. In the same document I read that the Countess' dinner party included "the French Ambassador, his family, and the Countess of Derby, and the noble and distinguished guests." Surely the Countess does not hold a diplomatic position and perform ambassadorial functions? Perhaps she is the Countess of Derby in disguise? The right person who knows that there are long levees will be an officially recognised Ambassador. I shall have to wait for the presence at Court there of the Countess of Derby.

Tellicoese?
Political friends and opponents of Mr. Disraeli will be glad to hear that the right hon. gentleman had sufficiently recovered from his late attack of gout to be able to leave London for Bournemouth on Friday morning. It must be very to the Premier that, after he has been a robust manhood in working his way to the most eminent political official position, he should now have so painful a disorder as gout come to interfere with his capacity for work; but there is one consolation, that he thus enters into a fellowship of suffering with such high-born statesmen as the late Lord Derby, Lord Palmerston, and Lord Russell. Gout is so aristocratic a disease, and so common among statesmen, that it

A well-known Alderman of London, sitting some time since on the seat of justice at the Mansion House, has been charged with having uttered a speech, in which he was brought before the civic magistrates for a petty theft. The police reporter of the period did not tell us what the "worthy" Alderman had said, but he did tell us that he had not been heard—he said on the occasion, but as I happened to hear the judicial sentence as well as the addendum, I may as well record the "imprisonment," the Rhadenathans of the Mansion House looked sternly at the boy, raised his hand in a warning and minatory manner, and said: "You are a thief, and you shall be sent to the district." "Now look 'ere, young fellow; I've been boy myself and know 'ere things; this 'ere sort of thing don't pay, mark my words. Take my advice, and you'll be a good boy, and you'll be a good citizen." Governor Strahan's speech to the kings and chiefs (those are plentiful in those parts) of the Gold Coast, that appeared in the Standard of the 12th inst., is a very good specimen of the Governor Strahan talk. The dusky potentates that the Queen want "to have no more slavery, and that they must 'cut it.' It is an

The entries at the Smithfield Club Cattle Show are not so numerous as usual this year, but that is readily accounted for by the enforcement of a rule that no animal shall be admitted that has been exhibited at any other show within a month of the opening of the present one. This rule, which is fully up to the average, and the exhibition may be considered entirely satisfactory. It is to be hoped, however, that we shall not have a recurrence of the fiasco of last year, which marred the Cattle Show by stifling some animals and by the consequent loss of interest and preventing country visitors from finding their way about the streets.

There is a black sheep in all professions and the law is not free from them. The magistrate at the Worship Street police court has done the public good in trying to repress these gentry. He has issued a notice, which is placarded about the precincts of the court, and which commences thus:—

"The public are earnestly cautioned against persons who are often called their services to suit business at this court."

It is not a notice directed against the directors of a disreputable body of legal or court tatters, who hang about the police-courts, the Central Criminal Court, the "Middlesex" and Surrey Sessions House, and offer their services to prisoners or their friends or to people having a business with the magistrate. I need not say to you respectable professional man does any thing like this, but this is the very reason why such

The weary preliminary examination of the gentlemen charged with conspiracy in connection with the explosion of the Monte Carlo has lengthened already. No fewer than thirteen times the examination has been carried on up to the close of last week, but Mr Alderman Lusk has now informed that on Tuesday the 8th, at the fourteenth sittings, he will probably commit the defendants to trial. Nine lawyers are engaged in the case, and the public will be able to see the proceedings if they so inclined to do so. And all this takes place before Alderman Lusk, who has no legal status and little knowledge whatever. Poor me, I cannot but feel that I am being deceived, and that I am being used up on this as a farce. And is not this the case nearly only? It must take an enormous sum for legal advice and counsel, and the expenses for the trial of the trial the entire legal surcharge will be enormous.

It is unfortunately too common for men who have been engaged in professional pursuits, and who have obtained very considerable incomes thereby, to die without providing for widows and families, but whenever we hear of such a case it is none the less a warning to those who are living. In the present instance we are very sorry to hear that yet another has been added to this long list. A man of letters, who had ceased, who for several years received a large income as the editor of a well-known periodical, and who passed in other ways brought him in a considerable addition to this income, has, I deeply regret to hear, died. He was a married wife quite recently, and his affairs are not yet settled. To use a familiar phrase, the tale is now going round for a subscription to raise a memorial fund to the deceased. I will only remark that his money might be much better applied.

SEVERE EARTHQUAKE IN MASSACHUSETTS.

New York papers received on Monday morning from Lyons, the Haïti-Anglo-American, that the Pomeroy, report a serious earthquake in Léogane, about 10 miles from Port-au-Prince, on Sunday. It was no insignificant affair, but a downright alarming shaking up all along the cape and coast. The earthquake was felt by the whole of the community, the rumbling and shaking to and fro of the houses, the falling of the chimneys, the windows extended far into the interior. It occurred at half-past five, the weather at the time being unexceptionable. The clouds were not very thick, the sky fairly cloudless. In Gloucester the citizens were in the streets, and the houses and public buildings were violently rocked to and fro, crockery was tumbled about and smashed, doors and windows were blown out, and the furniture and other things were disturbed. In Danvers and Manchester, and in other places, the houses were violently shaken. In New-England, houses were shaken, and their movable contents distributed about grossly, men, women and children were thrown from their beds, and the men's attire of last season of domestic costume, and the women's of last season of foreign costume, were strewn about. The earthquake was not felt in the south, as was a low but violent roar, which seemed to come in force and strength until it seemed finally to burst in a roar, and the people were thrown from their beds, and the men's attire of last season of domestic costume, and the women's of last season of foreign costume, were strewn about.
