FRIDAY, DECEMBER 22nd, 1862.

CHRISTMAS.

Winter has stolen a march on us this year. Christmas comes some before the snow, but this year the snow has come before Christmas, and the inconveniences of this premature irruption of January frosts in the middle of December have been very few. It gives a brisance to all that we describe as fancy goods. Books, prints, and presents of all kinds from the child's toy to the last edition of one of our English classics are expected to go off at this season. But nothing brings trade so much a standstill as snow. As an instance, a Scotch cattle train, with its live stock for the London Christmas market, was blocked up for several hours in the snow, and we can easily judge the effect of this on the quality of the stock, and the value of the market. Christmas and snow may fall in well together in the calendar of romance-writers, but for those who have to deal with facts as open Christmas, or at least mild weather during the week of Christmas preparations, is a condition of what they mean by a Merry Christmas. As a rule we may say that the Christmas holidays necessitate so much extra work among the large classes who cater for pleasure in its thousand shapes that their enjoyment of the after-season will depend on the amount of the bustle and work done before. Trade on the whole, fairly brisk, and, if we may judge by the display in the shops, we may expect a fair and active trade during the Christmas holidays. In no thing is the Englishman's characteristic more seen than in his love of the festive and the boisterous. He does not let the festive and the boisterous pass him by without a word. He takes his pleasure, as our old Froissart long ago remarked, mot trinité. It is perhaps no use regretting it, for every nation must have the faults of its qualities; but it is a thousand pities that there is not a little more poetry and what the French call élégance in our pleasure-making. In no aspect Christmas is inexpressibly sweet and sacred in this country. It is the feast of the family affections: it is the home-gathering of the most entertaining and adventurous of the most enterprising of our countrymen and Vikings. But for Christmas many Englishmen would part with the last link which binds them to the old folk at home. It is touching indeed to hear with what pity to the traditions of Old England and New the Englishman tries to keep up Mid-Winter solemnities under the blurring snow of a Mid-Summer Christmas at the Antipodes. It is absurd to look into the Yule log in an Australian shanty, and hear a man make a belief of a cold coal fire, and try to find out other stories with different constellations. Still, this effort to keep up old traditions is a link between the Anglo-Saxon race in the old country and in its dependencies. Christmas is coming, and the Christmas comes as a year is growing as familiar in Melbourne or Auckland as in London or Liverpool. A writer who lately has described his account of New Zealand under the attractive title of "Brighter Britain" gives a touching account of the city of young school-boys, equated in some unromanticable hymn to a hundred miles from Auckland. They had invited half the country round, from the local judge down to the smallest settler, to their picnic at Freze, and the account of the festive under these heat and the attempt to catch roach with the right bait were watching them across the river and only waiting for an opportunity of tawling their "Pa" is infinitely diverting. It is these glimpses of Brighter Britain which make us feel that the old country is not yet out of our eyes, and that Englishmen will be jolly as their fathers. This year the Christmas falling on Monday virtually means that two Sundays come together, and the consequence was that we are to keep two Saint Mondays, and there are two Sundays consecutive. According to this construction of the calendar, Sunday and Monday being Sundays, Tuesday and Wednesday will be regarded as virtually Mondays, and given up to industry, leaving only Thursday and Friday to make up what work is to be brought into the week. In these temperate times there is less danger of holidays than formerly, and this being so, we, for our part, can only rejoice that Christmas for a few days will take its foot out of the house, and make as good, if not joyful, during the last days of the old year and the first of the new.
