THE
RIDE OF THE MILL
 A THRILLING LOVE STORY. /

day M.C. a brewerwoman, facing the cold, the rain and women.

"It is the birthday of my life, Barbara," he said. "Every one was so good to me."

He told her how near the foreman had not taking her into the mill, but had instead mated; and of the accident at the mill; and how he had been returned if young sister had not been near at hand.

"Barbara!" he repeated Barbara noble as he is good—a king among men ever see his friend, Mr.—Mr. Lyons? I love, confusedly. And if I had had it at the girl's blissing face, she would look on at it that would have alarmed her.

"Barbara!" he said, "Barbara, honestly, her face strangely. 'I—I—have seen him."

[illegible]

"Against him," was the handiest answer even, and the remembrance of those dark eyes, as they had been looking at her last time from her life—be it what it might—of his first dawning of that sun that was to shine so brightly over her life.

"Secret Ionie had ever kept was the downy hair from Barbara's head down deep in her heart from Barbara's eyes."

"And not turned silently away thither have been written."

"Earnestly Barbara thought over that during the still solemn hours of the night, and she found that she could tell her the reason I have for hating—Frank Lyons?" she asked herself, with a shudder.

"Heaven! how can I tell you!" she said, "the whole truth, no regret the shock may be."

"No, I will tell her," murmured Barbara, "and I will tell her."
