CHAPTER III.

THE man to whom these ominous words are addressed conference in the centre, each with his principal a few paces in his rear. The English Lieutenant, attractedly picking up pebbles and throwing them into the water, keeping an ear, however, on his representative's negotiations; apparently relying on Mr. Barnes's assurance, he does not expect the affair will end very seriously. The young Corsican, on the contrary, stands erect, watching impatiently André de Belloc, and only anxious to face the Englishman, upon whom his eye, wherever it rests, glazes with passionate anger. Old Majo, who has during the preceding events been engaged in hanging out linen to dry upon the eaves and orange trees of his garden, now comes down and, gazing intently over Barnes's shoulder, whispers to him: "The English are queer people; that one there does not appear to hate; but the Corshipman, after a few words of apparent dissent, comes again to the centre, and, calling De Belloc to him, says in a tone significantly careless, "By-the-bye, I forgot to state that my man, before this affair goes any further, wishes to apologise!"

To apologise? "To apologise?" echoes De Belloc in surprise.

"Yes, Mr. Frenchman," he desires me to say for him that he's sorry he knocked that young man down, blackened his eye, and spoiled his beautiful features!" The very nonchalance of the Englishman's tone is almost an insult; in fact, as he speaks, Barnabas

DEAD !

THE extreme faintness of Paolo's voice had caught Barnes's attention the moment that he spoke ; it was in each noticeable contrast to his power immediately before the duel. He springs to him and feels his pulse ; for, with a physician's instinct, he knows but one thing could produce so marked a change in so short a time. As he does so, his colour becomes as pale as that of the young Corsican's himself, who now redines against the cliff at his back, and whose head droops as if he had no longer the strength to hold it upright.

De Belloc, pointing to the water, says, "An officer on that ship now leaving Corsica." chap 4 Bernes follows his hand, and sees the English gunboat has taken up the men who pursued it, and is now well under weigh down the harbour. The girl's eyes rest upon the man-of-war, that is now fast putting its hull below the horizon, and linger upon it as if she would draw the great ship back to her by the very power of her will. Then she suddenly cries "The flag is English! I shall find him—I will repay! I am a Corsican!" and begins to mutter wildly so
