where the dark blue uniforms of the artillery. As soon as the echo of the saluting guns had died away, the entire line presented arms, and two or three selected bands gave forth appropriate strains. The Lord-Lieutenant and staff then passed down the lines, which had taken up inspection order. At the close of the inspection, the word of caution for marching past was issued, and three selected bands marched up, took their position opposite the saluting flag, and played during the movement of the staff. The Lord-Lieutenant, the saluting driving the enemy from the woods, and having succeeded in rallying his broken ranks, the once more appears in force on the open plain. From this commanding position he pours crashing volley on the heads of our gallant ranks. The latter, however, stand firm, and it is not until the detachment, creeping down through the brush, contrived to take them in flank that they abandon the idea of yielding the ground they occupy. A retreat towards the bridge is commanded. The enemy takes care to accelerate by this means the pace at which they are closing in on him, so that he is brought down to the middle of the bridge.
