and as these gentlemen own a considerable number of buildings and other facilities for carrying out their air improvement. Mr. Clark was also an active agricultural societer, in all of which he was recognized as a leader. He acted as agent among others, for John E. Jones, Beaumont Hall; L. L. Lestienne, Beaumont Hall; C. C. Clark, Elmore Hall; Mr. Shepperdson, Beaumont Hall; Mr. Penwick, South Hill; and the Company. Besides attending to the agricultural duties of the company, he frequently called upon to valuate property, an arbitrator in disputed land cases; or almost always gave his services in the immediate cause of his death from which he had formed behind one of his eyes, sending every means that medical skill could devise, but without success. He died "and fell asleep" at an early hour on morning the 18th inst., aged 56 years. He will be missed.

Friday afternoon, about seventy of the Derwentwater's adherents, both male and female, were entertained to dinner by that lady, at the Crown Inn, Blackhill. A letter, which had been received from "the Countess," was read at the dinner. It is stated in the letter that documents have been discovered in the statements the "northern claimant" first made, and that they will, without changing her title as successor to the Derwent. The 26th of the present month is the day on which some startling will be made concerning these mysterious

To-day's death of Joseph, the son of the late Duke of Devonshire, is a tragedy, not only because of the sympathy by which it has been greeted, but because of the fact that the death of the young nobleman, who was so well known to the aristocracy, was the result of a quarrel which had its origin in a trifling matter. The Duke of Devonshire, who was the father of the late Duke, was a man of a very high position, and his death was a great loss to the country. and a staff of 100 men. He was admitted to the tomb of his father, who was buried there before Pharaoh, and he was told the interpretation given. Supposedly, the king was very pleased with a high regard for the wisdom of the man by whom he was told that he at once made him his Lord Chamberlain and gave him the rank of a prince. His life was exalted from the prison to the open prison, grace and the prison letters to the king, the vestments of fine linen and the golden crown were given him. He was paid him, for he rode in the second chariot and was carried before him. "How the king was pleased with him!" said the daughter of the priest of On, daughter of the most beautiful ladies in Egypt. The king gave him all the honours which were suddenly bestowed on him. He was given a chariot, a horse, a spear, a shield, a helmet, a breastplate, and one thus supplied can be seen of his. The lecturer then described the king's death and the funeral which followed, when the ground was like laying up thorpalus corn, during the first years, which he sold during the seven years, for the money and cattle and lands and his subjects. A graphic description was the appearance of the ten brethren who had been in the prison, and the manner of their reception by Joseph, and their confinement in the black hole, the fear of the conscience-brethren, who now found out that they were guilty of concealing the truth from Joseph, the anguish of his soul at their parting; they were released, and Simeon was bound away before their eyes, they recognized the way in which Joseph had been tied by the brethren. The brethren were permitted to depart from the prison, and the prison was left empty, which condition was filled with great regret how their census papers or parish registers got into Egypt. (Laughter). The lecturer to enlarge upon the incidents which took him the brethren quitted the city, and took all by Joseph. The speech of Judah on behalf Benjamin whom he had pledged himself back to his father, was described as being parallel for beautiful pleading, pathos, and other in the Bible or out of it. The way in which he pleaded for his father his integrity his life in offering his own life, all had their effect.
