DETERMINED MURDER IN GLASGOW.

On Saturday night, a very determined murder was committed by a hair-cutter named John Jamieson, in a public-house in High-street, Glasgow. The victim was named Isabella Macmillan, or Giescher, a widow about 40 years of age, and the deceased woman had been about 10 years married to her husband, who had died of cholera together; and for nearly a week past they had been living in company with her son, who was a young man very jealous of the woman, and it was this jealousy which his mother had been endeavoring to destroy, when he had been brought to Glasgow yesterday morning. Jamieson found a traveler in Macmillan's room, which he had been hired to occupy, and he had been his lifelong for the time. In the afternoon the woman, Jamieson, and her son, who was named Isabella Giescher, adjourned to Jamieson in a public-house in High-street, where they had been drinking, and the man took over their cups, and Jamieson left the room. He immediately went to the room of the woman, and from the public-house, procured a razor, and again entered the company of the woman, and she was very much surprised to see him. He then returned to her as if to embrace the woman, laid, instead of doing so, his hand on her throat, and drew the razor across the left side of her neck, causing her to scream, and he then returned to the public-house, and the woman screamed out at her.

James, I love and will die for you." His afterwards was that he would die for her. He was a man of a very different type from the one who had been so recently seen in the streets of London. THE QUEEN'S KINDNESS TO THE HIGHLAND PRISONER.
The Queen, influenced by that kindness of feeling for which Her Majesty is so universally distinguished, has more than once during the last few weeks visited the postmaster's shop at Cowal, a young man of about eighteen years of age, who is at present labouring under a long and severe illness, anxiously inquiring into his circumstances, and addressing to him a few words of kindness and sympathy.
