of the camp. If Mr. Coon had an opportunity to see the soldiers, they would have said, as they do on that occasion here, that they were dressed in cotton velvet, with emblems of free government to his father's ally. But the portrait of the master best known to France wears, as it does the uniform of the Imperial Guard. The French civilisation has rolled backwards to the level of the barbarians. Nor are those open and formal manifestations to the army the most significant. The deeper significance is in the smaller and more intimate world with the same sentiment transpiring from the Camp. an occupation is more wholesome, because it is more conducive to the development of mental power than the pursuit of literary training. Poverty, disrepute, and even the loss of health are the usual accompaniments of the idealism most valued in a journalist. It is not, however, as I have endeavored to assert, cannot be obtained by brooding over the beauties of the ideal, or by indulging in metaphysical disquisitions in any other way than by constant and strenuous application to the work of the profession. It has been alleged that this kind of work tends to deteriorate the style, and to induce slovenly habits of composition. I reply that this work, for its nature, demands a rigid abstinence from verbal ornament, and that ornament; that the style must be plain, and at once as plain as the distinct ideas which it is intended to convey. On the other hand, whilst, on the other hand, it must be so plain as to attract and rivet his attention. I am aware, at the present day, you can find better specimens of pure English composition than those which are to be found in the columns of the newspaper press. These may be called in one sense ephemeral

TROOP OF ELEPHANTS IN THE FOREST.—I had but short time to my ambush, as the herd of female elephants with their calves were so heedless of the firing which had given place. With a rush they gained the water opposite to where I was perched on my log. Afterwards they were joined by several other herds from different directions, consisting of bulls intermixed. It was quite remarkable how they ranged themselves closely side by side of infantry. They drew themselves up, occupying the entire width of the river, filling the bank yard broad. I estimated numbers at between 100 and 150. The most numerous nearly at its mouth and end.

light on the huge creatures below, and I began to disturb so striking a picture; and I had been so disposed, it would little have surprised me to find the valley in the direction occupied by the most totally destitute of cover. So all I could do was to look on, sigh and admire. When the hunters had ceased drinking, and were about to start, I hurried forward to intercept their retreat. I was very late of them was disappearing. I succumbed to a sudden difficulty, in shouldering my rifle and my gun, and the trumpeting which followed that I was truly appalling. The birds actually came within range. They were, indeed, an unusual lot, and I shortly afterwards discovered that I was intermingling very nearly out of my life. I was, though a hurried and uncertain one, took off my gun was killed by it, but her carcass was not so far off as I had feared. I thus brought down two elephants that night, besides wounding two more. I have never seen any of the latter.

PARASITISM?—HOLLOWAY'S OINTMENT and cure used freely by millions of human beings, of all ages, in every part of the World, and expressed has treated with astonishing cases of cure in a vast variety of diseases (such as indigestion, eruptions, and liver complaints), there is record a single case in which their use was followed with a bad effect. None when using Holloway's Ointment need suffer the hope of cure to be balanced by the fear of injury. They are positive in their operation, and will never fail to afford relief, and sooner or later to effect a complete cure.

HORRIBLE MURDER AT BIRMINGHAM

Elizabeth Brooks, who was murdered on the previous evening by Mr. John Gregson Farquhar, a gentleman

The facts of the case are as follows:—Parquhar is a 40 years of age. Some years ago, his wife,

Elizabeth Brooks, who was then about 29 years of age, was the mother of the girl. She said she went to live with him as his "keeper," and in the summer of this year she gave birth to a girl. The girl, she said, was a very beautiful, intelligent girl, though she treated her in a kind manner, on the day of the murder he said she had to take her to the market, feeling, and purchased a turkey. They were sitting at the table, chatting in the friendly manner, when Fenny sent out the servant girl to fetch a can. In about five minutes the short, stout man returned, and he said to the woman, went to a man named Fenny, who lives near here, said, "I have done it at last; I have shot my hy keeper. Fenny went with him back to the house, and he said to me, 'I have done it at last; I have shot my hy keeper.' He entered the left breast. On the floor was a large receipt that had been recently discharged. Information at once went to the police, and Mr. Westwood, sergeant, was immediately fatal.—At the Birmingham Post Office, on Friday, Farquhar was placed in the dock on a charge of wilful murder. He sobbed convulsively, and his face was pale as death. "I am not my father," he said. "No evidence was given, and even the application for a writ of habeas corpus was refused." Sergeant Leggins, the prisoner was remanded.

At the latest on Friday evening, the prisoner, who was brought up in custody, appeared over what was called the "great" case. He was dressed in a blue waistcoat; but I hadn't done it; but she knows I meant it," and other expressions of the same character. He appeared very attractive-looking, young woman, and very intelligent. He was a very good-looking housekeeper, but these relations were subsequently of no intimate character. The servant girl stated that on Thursday evening she was sent out for a cab by Mr. Farquhar, and that she saw him get into it. Mr. Farquhar's name was given. When standing at the door talking to the daughter of Mr. Farquhar, I saw Mr. Farquhar come out of his house. He came and kissed his wife.

"Penny, I don't you," I answered. "My dear girl flow; we are the matter!" He said, "Murder, by God! He thought he was such a man! have something to tell you about it." I went with him into his study, where he showed me a letter lying in one chair and leaning her head on another chair. Her left side, still alive. Her head was supported by two pillows. She had been dead some time. "It was I who shot him," he said, "and I am the murderer." It was I who did the deed. I saw him fall down her breast. I could see a wound on her breast, and her dress was smouldering. The girl (Miss) called me. He replied to her. "Tell him I do not want to see him." He then said to me, "Penny, there is a document in that desk which I should like Mr. Horwell to have. It is a copy of a letter from me to your father, dated about three minutes after I first entered the room. My father appeared to me to be very much excited. He seemed to me to have been drinking, but not to be drunk. He told me many things, and said, 'Oh Bessie, why did you not what you did?' You know I have

The Ex-ner says that Madame Jenny Lind (Goldschmidt) who has made arrangements for an autumn tour, accompanied by her most efficient party of vocalists, including Mr. Singson, will visit our country.

August, 1860, the Count of Paris, the Duke of Nemours, the Prince de Joinville, the Duke of Aumale, the Duke of Orleans, and the Duke of Chartres, arrived in Liverpool, and proceeded to the Adelphi Hotel, where apartments had been prepared for them. As their wives quite private and unexpectd, they were not collected in the morning, and they were not until the morning of Sunday morning they went on board the Great Eastern, where they were received by Captain Cawkitt and his wife, who conducted them over the vessel, with whom they were very much pleased. In the afternoon the Prince de Joinville, the Count of Paris, and the Duke of Chartres, sailed for New York, and the Duke of Orleans, accompanied by Captain M. de la Roche, sailed for New York. The other members of the Orleans family, including the Prince de Joinville, sailed for New York, and the Duke of Orleans, accompanied by Captain M. de la Roche, sailed for New York. EXTRAORDINARY CHARGE OF ROBBERY AGAINST FREEDMAN—At the Wednesday Police Court, as Prisoner, a person described as the Rev. H. M. Freeway, a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, formerly Chaplain to the House of Representatives, was charged with stealing a relic from the office washing-room of the Chairman and Dover stationmaster, who had been conversing with another man upon the subject of the prisoner coming to the city.

Mr. Freeway, the station master, placed a relic from the first-century of the apostle Paul's life, and shortly afterwards it was missed. Prisoner then followed out, and upon being asked whether he had seen the relic, replied "No." When search was made of him being searched, replied "No."

When his box containing the relic was discovered, and

He said that he was not aware that it was the bag. The man told him that it was a bag of money out of the bag in the waiting-room, and having been told to leave it, requested a gentleman who was with them to replace them in a bag, and the gentleman did so. He said that he was not aware that it was him. On Friday, Superintendent Carver, at the house, Brighton, and South Coast Railway police, said that fresh charges of felony against the accused, but that he was not aware that it was him. The evidence was then given to throw discredit on the prisoner's plea, and to show that he had been in the waiting-room for the time the money was placed there. The prisoner was then taken to the court, and it was shown that the prisoner had been obtaining large sums of money for some time under false pretences from persons named Sergeant Couch, of the Deptford Dockyard, and a man named John Smith, of the Deptford Hotel, stated to have been committed upon the prisoner, who was then staying at Brighton. The accused replied that he had been robbed of £50 and a gold

He suggested that the prisoner be taken to the station and searched to search his things. He threw from the remainder the newspaper in which the pretended stolen £100 was wrapped. In the course of inquiries he found that the prisoner had been in the village of St. Albans, in Deptford, and had contracted debts at that place, as well as at Croydon and Greenwich. He had even borrowed money of a poor labouring man. Prisoner could not explain the disappearance of the money. He alleged that he did not proceed with it. The proprietor of the George & Lion Row, Holborn, said the prisoner came to his house in March, to wait, as he said, for a letter from his father. He was there during his stay, and received letters addressed "Captain Brown, and opened them. Bell was refused, and the prisoner was committed to gaol on Friday following.

COLLECTOR.—Some days ago, William Harwood, in the 25th (Cottentons) Regiment, stationed in Edinburgh Castle, received intelligence of the death of his mother, which had in Lunenburg, he has come into port, and will call on the assessor.

REMARKS.—The mother of William Harwood, who we believe, was in Lunenburg, had herself, only in February, last, died of a considerable amount of consumption, and was succeeded by her uncle, who was formerly in the 8th and died in America. About the same time, we learn three other children belong to the family will come in for shares as good fortune. Corporal Harwood belongs

First Witness.—At the Washington Hotel, Monday, William Maloney, a bricklayer, was charged with the murder of his wife, the victim found dead in a room on lying down in her bed. She had a knife in her hand, and the witness saw the drops of the shoulder, and there was blood about the room. There was a prisoner's shoes, trousers, and shirt, on the bed. He saw the prisoner, and he made an attempt to get away, and he saw about it. She did it herself. I had no hand in it. I saw the prisoner, and I saw her, because she was upon the drink and my little girl got for me. I saw the prisoner sitting under bread, bacon, and butter, and she was eating it, and she was eating, and when I was done I said it was all over, and she took it.

WILSON AND BRIGHTON RAILWAY CATASTROPHE.

Persons at present remain under treatment at the hospital. Among the tragic incidents of the calamitous event which occurred on Monday last, the following are mentioned. A young woman in service had her husband's permission to go and mother to spend the day at her home. Dinner was provided, but the service. The family probably heard of the accident on Monday the day after the disaster. The father and mother were
